Chapter 241: The Blossoming Civilization

The trees born from the Second World Tree’s seeds had now spread across every planet and moon in the multiverse, their towering forms a testament to the divine will of Sung Jin-Woo. These trees were more than mere flora—they were the lifeblood of countless civilizations, reshaping the very nature of life and existence.

---

1. The Universal Bounty of the Trees

Mana Lakes

Each tree was surrounded by a massive lake of pure mana, shimmering with ethereal light. The water from these lakes was no ordinary liquid—it was mana in its most concentrated form, capable of revitalizing and empowering anyone who consumed it.

Civilizations drank this mana-rich water to enhance their physical and magical abilities.

The water cured ailments, extended lifespans, and provided a sense of invigoration unmatched by any previous source.

Fruits of Power

The fruits of these trees were the most sought-after treasures. Radiating with divine energy, they had transformative properties:

Consuming a single fruit could raise a person’s level, increasing their strength and abilities exponentially.

The fruits were also imbued with unique powers, granting individuals abilities such as enhanced perception, elemental manipulation, or even limited immortality.

Leaves of Life

Even the fallen leaves of the trees were revered:

When brewed into teas or elixirs, they provided immense stamina and vitality.

Crushed leaves were used in alchemy, creating potions and artifacts of unparalleled power.

---

2. The Impact on Civilizations

Effortless Growth

With access to the trees, civilizations no longer needed to train rigorously to grow stronger. The lake water, fruits, and leaves provided them with:

Effortless leveling up, allowing even the weakest individuals to reach heights once thought impossible.

Enhanced physical and magical capabilities, turning ordinary beings into extraordinary warriors and scholars.

Unified Development

The trees fostered a sense of unity and cooperation among civilizations:

Beings of different races—humans, elves, dragons, shadow-born, and celestials—came together to share the resources of the trees.

Communities flourished around the trees, forming thriving cities and societies powered by their bounty.

A New Era of Prosperity

This abundance of mana and power ushered in a golden age:

Scientific advancements, powered by the limitless energy of the trees, allowed for innovations in technology, medicine, and exploration.

Cultural exchanges between realms led to an unprecedented era of peace and collaboration.

---

3. Sung Jin-Woo’s Vision Fulfilled

From his vantage point in the Umbra Citadel, Sung Jin-Woo observed the unfolding prosperity with quiet satisfaction. The trees were not just a source of power—they were a means to elevate all life across the multiverse. His vision of a harmonious, thriving cosmos was becoming reality.

He declared:

> “Let no being be bound by weakness. Let the fruits of these trees grant strength, and let the waters of their lakes bring life. Through these trees, all shall rise.”

---

4. The Evolution of Beings

Ordinary Beings Turned Heroes

The widespread use of the trees’ bounty had profound effects:

Once-ordinary beings became heroes and champions, capable of protecting their worlds from any threat.

Even the weakest species gained the strength to thrive, leveling the playing field across the multiverse.

The Rise of New Powers

Civilizations began to see the emergence of new powers and abilities:

Elemental mastery, celestial manipulation, and even limited control over time and space became possible.

Societies started producing natural prodigies, individuals born with unparalleled talent due to their exposure to the trees.

---

5. The Multiverse’s Future

The trees were more than just tools for survival—they were the foundation of a new era:

Exploration expanded as beings used their newfound strength to venture into previously uncharted territories.

Diplomacy flourished, as the shared reliance on the trees fostered peace and understanding.

Yet, amidst this prosperity, whispers began to spread of beings who sought to exploit the trees’ power for domination. Sung Jin-Woo’s shadow soldiers remained vigilant, ready to protect the multiverse from any who would disrupt its newfound balance.

The multiverse had entered a new age—a time of unparalleled growth and opportunity, guided by the Divine Triad’s vision and protected by their eternal vigilance.